I must say that I had boped from the long time that I have been employed by you is superintending several buildings that you have had erected, and when I positively assured you that your building was built in the most substantial manner, that you would have had sufficient confidence in my ability, and would not require any further evidence of its being substantial, but as you insist that is not to satisfy yourself, but to consteract the false reports of "some persons" that you request the investigation. I herewith give my consent, and will call upon the Architecta and Builders of this city, to examine your building and express their opinion, regarding its merits or defects. At the same time allow me to again asser, that I shall always be proud to refer to your building, as a specimen of my Architectural ability, and I have no doubt that cour petent men, will pronounce it a good and substantial work. And also, that it will stand upon its present foundation long after I shall have been forgotten, unless it is destroyed by some cause foreign to a defect in its construction.

Your humble servant.

This powerfully written fiction embraces one of the most exciting periods of English History, the reign of the Royal Bluebeard Henry VIII. The high dramatic interest of the plot, the developments of Court intrigues in love and politics, the perils and adventures of the hero and herothe of the story, the rapid, uninterrupted sweep of the narrative which seems to bear the reader with it and render him an actual spectator of the stormy seemes of that stormy era, stamp the work as one of the greatest Historic and chivairic Romances which have appeared since the days of Sir Walier Scott.
